James Stenson challenges us as parents to begin early to think about the kind of character we hope our children will have when they are grown men and women.

1. Will they be competent and responsible adults who live by high moral standards?
2. Will they make good husbands and wives and good mothers and fathers?
3. Will their marriages be happy and lasting?

Successful parents, Stenson says, see themselves as raising adults. They view their children as adults -in-the-making.

The Family Club is based on creating a village with people very keen to bring up children with character and virtue. It's three main characteristics are: friendship, friendship and friendship.

Families help and support each other to bring up their children, and create their own healthy and effective environment.

The biggest danger to children is the "collapse of family life" - not simply divorce, but the failure of families to connect. It is a struggle for parents to "get enough weight in the home to outbalance the media and the peer group".
